Modern science and 21st-century research confirm what many have long known: healing from trauma happens most effectively within safe, supportive, and lasting relationships. This powerful workshop offers a unique, lived-experience perspective from someone who grew up in the foster care system, navigating the pain of separation from biological family and the struggle to find meaningful, non-relative connections that could support healing and growth. Through a dynamic PowerPoint presentation and heartfelt lecture, the speaker will share personal stories of loss, disconnection from family and siblings, and the emotional toll of those early years in care. The session will then shift to highlight the role that dedicated professionals played in helping to form healthy, non-relative relationships that became essential to the healing process. Participants will also explore creative tools like vision boards and journaling—approaches used to help older youth in care reflect, dream, and prepare for life after foster care. Journals will be provided to participants to use in their own work with youth, encouraging practical application beyond the session. The workshop will conclude with an inspiring message about how connection, both found and formed, fueled the speaker's personal healing and now power the impactful work they do every day.
